What Are Double-Hung Windows?

Double-hung windows differ from single-hung, casement, and bay windows by their unique "double movement" action. If you were to see double and single-hung windows next to each other in a store, you'd have a hard time telling them apart. However, both the top and the bottom half of the sash can open. This gives you more design options when installing your windows and makes it easier to access the exterior glass.

Double-hung windows are also not much more expensive than single-hung windows. A typical single-hung windows costs anywhere from $200-$400, while a double-hung is $300-$600. This makes them a good middle ground between more expensive casement and bay windows, the latter of which can cost anywhere from $1,000-$2,500 per window.

As a result, it's much easier to invest in a full double-hung window replacement than it is in casement or bay windows. While you might save more money by using single-hung windows, double-hung windows are typically a better option.

Benefits of Double-Hung Windows

Beyond the double movement action that also helps make them easier to clean, double-hung windows offer a myriad of benefits to the consumer. Some of the most popular reasons people buy double-hung windows include:

- Versatile style that goes well with just about any home style and wood stock
- Multiple material options, include aluminum, fiberglass, wood, and vinyl
- Easier access makes them perfect for screens and air conditioners in the summer
- More energy efficient than competitor windows, with an option of quadruple weatherstripping.

In fact, double-hung windows are typically rated among the most energy efficient windows on the market. And as far as style goes, it's hard to beat the incredible range of double-hung window options. They look great just about anywhere on your home, but are particularly useful for bedroom windows, bathroom windows, and even as decorative windows in a living room.

Advantages of Double Hung Vinyl Replacement Windows

If it is time to replace your windows, one choice you will need to make is whether to purchase double hung replacement windows or single hung replacement windows. Some of the better windows on the market are double hung vinyl replacement windows and unlike most things, excellent quality does not have to cost you more.

Advantages of Vinyl Windows

There are several advantages to using vinyl replacement windows that most homeowners will appreciate. There are lower energy costs during winter and summer as the vinyl will remain tighter than most materials no matter the weather. These windows are also almost maintenance-free. It is nearly impossible to scratch or stain vinyl windows, and painting will never be an issue. When these windows need to be cleaned, simple soap and water can do the trick.

Another advantage is the cost. Although vinyl windows are the most affordable option for window material, they are still solid and durable. The homeowner won't have to worry about rust or rot like some other materials. Vinyl windows are a great combination of being made of the least expensive material that windows are made from, yet they remain durable.

Another great thing about replacement vinyl windows is they come in a variety of options. These windows come in a large assortment of colors, they come in a wide variety of sizes, and you can find the style to fit the architecture of your home.

Single Hung vs Double Hung Windows

A single hung window has one sash that can be moved up and down. A double-hung window has two sashes that can be moved up and down. The advantages to that configuration are at least two-fold:

- Because both sashes are able to move up and down, you can add to the amount of ventilation in your home. Some homeowners will open the top sash to ventilate warm air and the lower sash to circulate the air. This allows a greater amount of comfort for longer periods of the year.
- Another advantage that many homeowners appreciate is that it is easier to clean a double-hung replacement window safely while keeping your feet firmly planted inside your home by using the window tilting technology.
